Where Quality Counts, Your Money Goes Farthest

FR. COUGHLIN CHARGES PLOT

ROYAL OAK, Mich., Nov. 12 (Universal).—An artificial money panic, plotted last week by international bankers to discredit President Roosevelt's gold revaluation policy, was thwarted Saturday by the President, the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, radio priest of the Shrine of the Little Flower, de-radio broadcasts over a nationwide hook-up.

"Last week, all of a sudden, the great banks, including the federal reserve, suddenly ceased buying government bonds," Father Coughlin said. Mr. Roosevelt was being punished, as it were, for his nefarious gold revaluation.

"Propaganda was being prepared to state that the government was bankrupt.

"But suddenly, Saturday morning, in fact, the bankers began to buy the government bonds. They suddenly remembered that the President had an ace up his sleeve—the power to issue treasury notes against bonds to the extent of three billion dollars!

"This time, they were frustrated in creating an artificial panic and in discrediting our chief executive.

"I tell you these things because with your knowledge of them we can more easily, more quickly win this most momentous contest of the century."

Father Coughlin said gold revaluation was the first step in monetizing silver as a means of creating a "cheaper and more honest" dollar. This action is opposed by banking interests.

MATTY'S MEMOIRS

As Told to James Gordon Fraser
By Frank Matty

CHAPTER XIII.
I thought I knew something about politics when J. K. McGuire came into the city hall, but I found out that I had only begun to find out what it was all about.

One of the first things he sprung on me was that he wanted Melvin Z. Haven, who was a sort of independent up to that time, but a strong McGuire man, for city clerk. Personally, I didn't have a thing in the world against Haven, but I had some people of my own I wanted to take care of, and I backed away with the idea of making a deal later to get my people in.

We had 10 Democratic aldermen at that time—a good working majority. And we were sticking together pretty well, too. Not even McGuire could get 10 votes unless I wanted to give them to him. That is, he couldn't get 10 Democratic votes. I learned before long that, when J. K. McGuire wanted something, votes were votes and it didn't matter what party brand was on them.

We had several preliminary skirmishes, during one of which McGuire made his famous speech about me, which I intend to print in these memoirs if I can find it in my scrapbook. It was a classic. I even admired it, myself, knowing how untrue and unjust some of the things he said actually were.

When we got up to the time we were to elect a city clerk—which was done by the Common Council in those days—I found out that McGuire had been having some more preliminary conferences with somebody else. It was Francis Hendricks, the Republican boss. When I got over to the city hall that day, good old John Regan, who was alderman of the Fifteenth and as square a shooter as ever lived, told me:

"Frank, there's a deal on. McGuire has got it set for Haven. He has agreed to make Henry Stephens, who is a Hendricks man, deputy clerk."

I had a man—John Keefe—for that job, myself, as well as a candidate for custodian of the city hall. This was Jim Croak, who had long been helpful to me over in the ward and who was rated, for some reason, by McGuire, who had called him a "ballot-box stuffer" and been used on account of it. But I found out that I would have to let Keefe go if I wanted to save Croak.

McGuire had got Hendricks to deliver two Republican votes—those of Robert Ballard, of the Eleventh and Otto Thomas, of the Eighteenth to Haven, in return for six of our Democratic votes for Stephens. The six were Jim Ludington of the Fourth, George Freeman of the Seventh, John Troendle of the Ninth, John Regan of the Fifteenth, John Mahar of the Seventeenth, and Ed McLaughlin of the Nineteenth.

Frank Costello, of the First; Howard Lincoln, of the Fifth, and "Copper John" Oswald of the Sixteenth were willing to stand out with me to the finish. Well, that's the way it went through. McGuire got Mel Haven, Hendricks got Stephens, I got Croak, and the other boys got the rest of the patronage the way they lined it up. George Metz, another Republican, was elected city messenger as part of the same deal. Frank Lynch, a friend of George Freeman's, was made weigher of hay, and McLaughlin's man, Jim Kennedy, got a job as clerk to the assessors.

I knew how everything was going before we got into session, but it looked to me like a good chance to put McGuire in wrong with a lot of Democrats, and I made a pretty strong speech. I find in my scrapbook this quotation from one of the local papers, telling next day what I said in the Common Council meeting:

"I have been a member of this council since 1883, with the exception of three or four years. In that whole time, I never voted for a Republican. A Republican has now been elected to the office of messenger and deputy city clerk, and this council stands Democratic by a majority of one, showing that there are traitors in our camp.

"Those men are not deserving of trust by their constituents. I am here to denounce any man, friend or foe, who would enter into such a despicable scheme to plot as they do to rupture the Democratic party, if they really belong to it. I say that the men who have done it here tonight will never again be heard of in politics. I mention no names. Let them talk to their own people. I say to those men that they are politically dead. Better men in this council in the past have gone into deals and have killed themselves politically.

"I predict the same thing for the men who are carrying out this scheme. They have the indignation of every honest Democrat in the United States of America. Our ballots are marked. We eight agreed on a mark and the ballots are preserved. Then men whose work doesn't appear on these tickets are the men who are carrying on this despicable scheme."

Gene Mack, who was the Republican minority leader, got up and said there were also some traitors in his camp, pointing out that Ballard and Thomas had voted for the deal. But I told them that was to be expected. McGuire had a terrible time defending himself against the charge that he was dealing with Hendricks. He made several speeches to the newspapers, admitting that he had made the deal but declaring he was forced into it because he couldn't control the council against me. He had been damping Hendricks up hill and down dale during the campaign, and his confession didn't set so well with a lot of people who supported him. It helped me and hurt him.

As it turned out, Mel Haven made a good man as city clerk. He and I got along very well together, and it was Mel Haven who made it possible for me to put over what I think was the outstanding political victory of all time in Syracuse—the time I beat Gene Mack for the presidency with 11 ballots when 11 men swore they had never voted for me. That was something that doesn't happen, anymore. A lot of old-timers will recall it.

One thing that always bothered McGuire when he was having this battle with me was the fact that he could never make any argument from my votes. When I had some legislation to put through that the "combine" wanted, I always arranged to have at least one more vote for it than I needed. Then, I would vote against it, and it would go into the record. Later, when McGuire would find fault with the legislation and try to make out that it was bad, he would say:

"Matty is responsible for putting these things through." And when I would say to him: "How do you make that out? Look at the record and you'll find that I voted against it!" Well, it wouldn't fool McGuire any, but it did handicap him. He couldn't make people see how I could be a maining legislation through the Common Council and voting against it, myself. The other boys understood it, all right, and they didn't mind.

This habit of mine of setting the record in shape enabled me to make a joke out of one of McGuire's attacks, the time he tried to tie me up with all the trolley franchise grabs. I backed him away from that one quick.

HUNTER SHOT BY FRIEND

By Staff Correspondent.

TUPPER LAKE, Nov. 13.—Shot in the thigh as he stood watch at the edge of a swamp, Clarence Syron, 50, of Clyde, was critically wounded Sunday afternoon while hunting with a party of 16 men four miles southwest of the Windfall house. He is in Mercy General Hospital.

Syron was stationed at the edge of the swamp while other members of the party were driving through it in search of deer. The shot was fired by Del Thorn of Clyde, it is said.

According to information available, the two men were about 60 feet apart. Syron wore a red hunting cap. After the accident, Syron was carried out of the woods on an improvised stretcher of bougias and limbs.

Hunters Shovel Way Out of Mountains
WATERTOWN, Nov. 13.—Deer hunters, trapped by heavy snow in the Salmon River section, showed for hours through heavy snowdrifts to reach the Salmon River road before they could get started home. Nearly 40 loads of hunters wielded shovels from five miles above Sears' Pond down to the Salmon River road Sunday. Snow was from 20 inches to four feet deep in that section and the hunters worked from morning until early afternoon to get the road open to the state highway.
